"Words, words, they're all we've got to go on."1 This is how Tom Stoppard, in his revision of Shakespeare's Hamlet, defines the ambiguous character of human experience, which is projected by means of a discourse necessarily subject to various interpretations. A discourse codified by the myths and fictional creations of the community, therefore carrying social and individual features. An enigma which requires the act of decoding, and whose interpretation is charged with Desire.

Theatre, because it continuously confronts the spectator with such a need for decoding implied in Stoppard's text, foregrounds precisely the enigmatic character of our discourse and of human experience itself. It brings into focus the relation between being and appearance, a relation which is ambiguous, fluctuating in each act of speech, carrying a multiplicity of meanings.

Operating basically on the principle of ambiguity, and with irony and reversal its main structural devices, Macbeth thus projects these essential questions, as it deals with the polysemic nature of the discourse and the connection between desire and interpretation.

The ascension of Macbeth to power is in itself characterized by an irony which makes evident the ambiguity and the illusory character of that power. His trajectory upward is due to his apparent fulfillment of the value codes of his community, but it constitutes in reality a farce, since in the same ascension he is violating, without the knowledge of the group, the very codes he pretends to espouse. At first the saviour of the community, Macbeth will later be seen as an element of pollution. From king to pharmakós, from friend to enemy, from support to threat, Macbeth is subject to a polarization of readings by the members of the community. This reveals that he is nothing more than a fictional creation of himself and of the social group, thus personifying the double character of human beings. The play, in this way, projects the polarities of the Absolute and the Relative, of the Objective and the Subjective, each thing containing its opposite, and revealing the paradoxical nature of reality.

The act of interpretation —"words, words, they're all we've got to go on" — is required from the characters at every step. Questions are asked, enigmatic answers are offered, the decoding of messages is carried out. From Macbeth's speeches to the opinions formulated by other characters, from his dialogues with the witches and the enigmatic answers given by the apparitions conjured up at his request, from the initial blindness to the gradual insight of the group in relation to the King's acts, everything is used to foreground the ambiguity of words and the relativity of interpretation. The discourse can be used to mask or unmask reality, it may be correctly or incorrectly interpreted, it may be given a partial reading, it may constitute an instance of persuasive manipulation on the part of the enunciator which the enunciatee may perceive or ignore. At any rate, what is emphasized in every case is the complexity of the act of interpretation. From the very first speeches by the characters, different — and even opposed — types of reading are suggested: a systematic opposition of cognitive fields is established, be it in relation to the levels of knowledge of different characters, be it in relation to their knowledge and that of the audience. Statements carrying one particular meaning from the enunciator's viewpoint acquire another value and are interpreted as omens by the spectators — they become true, but not in the sense in which they were formulated by the enunciator. Or, in other cases, the spectator realizes the enunciator is consciously making a false statement — but the enunciatee ignores this fact and accepts the statement as true. Or, still, without the enunciator's knowledge, what is said is completely opposed to the facts presented. All of these oppositions thus constitute the basic form of organization of the text, and its most relevant structural components: irony and reversal. From the beginning of the play to its end, this will be constantly reelaborated, pointing to the dominant themes of the text.

In the first scene of act I the witches announce: "Fair is foul, and foul is fair." The use of alliteration and the equivalence of the signifiers fair/foul, as well as the parallelism of the construction, establish one of the most recurrent devices employed by Shakespeare in this play: the juxtaposition of contraries, a vehicle for the projection of the theme of the paradoxical nature of reality. What is made evident is that each thing contains its opposite — the double character of phenomena — and there is a suggestion that an univocal reading will be necessarily flawed and incomplete. In addition, the possibility of identifying Macbeth and the witches is suggested as he, in his first speech, will use exactly the same words: "So foul and fair a day I have not seen" (I.iii.38). This first reference to Macbeth's double nature will be reinforced by other statements which, with no such intention on the part of the enunciators, will be reversed so as to refer to him in a negative manner.
Such is the case of the sergeant's description of the battle which has ended with Macbeth's victory: "As whence the sun
'gins his reflection/Shipwracking storms and direful thunders break, /So from that spring whence comfort seem'd to come/Discomfort swells" (I.ii.25-28). The statement as it is formulated aims only at praising Macbeth for having overcome all the obstacles up to his final victory but it may be interpreted as an omen. The irony becomes evident when the King decides to have the traitor Thane of Cawdor killed and transfer his title to Macbeth, stating that "no more that Thane of Cawdor shall deceive our bosom interest" (I.ii.65-66). But it will be precisely the new Thane of Cawdor, associated in the description of the battle with the sun, who will inaugurate in Scotland a period of "discomfort," with "shipwracking storms and direful thunders." In scene IV, still referring to the first Thane of Cawdor, Duncan affirms that
"there's no art to find the mind's construction in the face"
(I.iv.11-12), for that had been "a gentleman on whom I built an absolute trust" (I.iv.13-14) — the same blind trust he now transfers to Macbeth. Likewise, the praises Duncan addresses to his cousin acquire a meaning of pressage and are thus to be seen in their ironic implications: "More is thy due than more than all can pay" (I.iv.21); "I have begun to plant thee and will labour to make thee full of growing" (I.iv.28-29); "it is a peerless kinsman" (I.iv.58). These statements, as well as those in which Macbeth reaffirms his loyalty to the King, may be contrasted to his speeches in the scene with the witches. One realizes that Duncan's words are true, but in a sense contrary to that which he has conferred on them: Macbeth does believe he deserves more than the honors Duncan grants him; he will try to reach full growth; and, indeed, there is no kinsman like him, for he will murder his cousin in his own house, violating at the same time the rules of loyalty to the King, of hospitality, and of kinship.

Another form of irony used in the text is the creation of an opposition between cognitive fields. In most cases, the opposition occurs between what Macbeth knows and what the other characters do. In terms of the audience, the level of knowledge parallels Macbeth's, which decreases dramatic irony but still indicates that multiple possibilities of interpretation exist.

One of the devices used to deepen the audience's level of perception is Macbeth's asides, by means of which his thoughts are conveyed to the audience, without being heard by the other characters. Likewise, his letter to Lady Macbeth and the various monologues (his or Banquo's) have the same function: the characters interrupt the interpretation of their social roles and are revealed in their totality. Another example is the fact that the audience — unlike most of the other characters — partakes in Macbeth's visions, which reveal either his desires (the witches and the dagger in II.i.) or his feeling of guilt (Banquo's ghost at the banquet). Only at one moment does the audience reach a level of cognition superior to the protagonist's: having already heard the prophecies foretold by the apparitions conjured up by the witches (IV.i.), the spectators realize that with the stratagem to be used by Malcolm, son of the murdered King, to fool Macbeth, the destruction of the usurper is imminent. But throughout the whole play, the contrast is established between Macbeth and his wife, on the one hand, and the other characters on the other. The opposition between appearance and reality, and the function of human discourse in the projection of such opposition is expressed by Lady Macbeth as she addresses her husband:

Your face, my thane, is as a book where men
May read strange matters. To beguile the time,
Look like the time; bear welcome in your eye,
Your hand, your tongue: look like the innocent
flower,
But be the serpent under't.
(I.v.63-68)

From this point on, there will be a series of incorrect readings effected by the various characters, thus reinforcing the irony: Duncan's praise addressed to Macbeth or his wife, Macduff's attempt to prevent her listening to the account of the murder:
O gentle lady:
'Tis not for you to hear what I can speak;
The repetition in a woman's ear
Would murder as it fell.

(II.iii.90-93)

In several other instances, false statements are accepted as true by the other characters, such as Macbeth's words after the crime. However, it is even more ironic that these statements will be indeed revealed as true, but in a sense Macbeth does not suspect at this point:

Had I but died an hour before this chance
I had liv'd a blessed time; for, from this instant,
There's nothing serious in mortality,
All is but toys; renown and grace is dead,
The wine of life is drawn, and the mere lees
Is left this vault to brag of.

(II.iii.98-103)

Macbeth's objective is to cover the fact that he has committed the crime. But without knowing he is making an affirmation which will be repeated at the end of the play, and this time he will really mean it — his famous monologue on the illusory character of human experience.

A similar instance of irony occurs in III.i. when Macbeth, already crowned as King, invites Banquo — his "chief guest" — to take part in the banquet he will offer that night. Banquo accepts the invitation, as his duties "are with a most indissoluble tie for ever knit" (III.i.18-19) to Macbeth. The reference to the ties, that can be interpreted as the secret both of them share, is in itself ironic; but even more so is the fact that Macbeth has already decided to eliminate Banquo, and the invitation is again a form of manipulation. After being murdered, however, Banquo indeed becomes Macbeth's "chief guest": his ghost will come to the banquet, causing the King to lose control.

The opposite use of a false discourse constitutes an additional form of reversal. Such is the case of the dialogue between Macduff and Malcolm in which the latter, aware of the fact that an appearance of honesty may be the vehicle of treason, tests Macduff's loyalty to his cause and to Scotland. Malcolm, the real heir to the crown, describes himself as an oppressor potentially more destructive than Macbeth. As he receives proof that Macduff's loyalty is authentic, he then reverses what he had said about himself. The same dominant themes are thus restated — the ambiguous nature of human discourse, the opposition appearance/reality, and the role of the discourse in the projection of this duality.

To follow the same line of analysis, one of the most important scenes to reveal the complexity of the act of decoding and the connection between interpretation and desire is Macbeth's reading of the prophecies voiced by the witches or the apparitions. In his second encounter with the witches, the determining role of desire in the act of decoding will become evident. The apparitions conjured up by the witches do not give direct answers to the questions posed by Macbeth, but in an enigmatic manner announce the future. What the King fails to perceive is not only that the prophetic discourse announces his destruction, but also the fact that the apparitions themselves are signs to be decoded. The first apparition is an armed Head, who warns the King against Macduff. At the end of the play, Macduff will kill Macbeth and cut off this head. The second apparition is a bloody child, who announces he should

    Be bloody, bold, and resolute;
    laugh to scorn
    The power of man, for none of woman born
    Shall harm Macbeth.
    (IV.i.79-81)

The king interprets the prophecy as an announcement that no man will be capable of destroying him. At the end, however, it will become clear that the bloody child was a sign of Macduff himself, since he had been "from his mother's womb untimely ripp'd" (V.vii.44-45), thus not having had a natural birth. The third apparition, a child crowned with a tree in his hand, announces:

    Be lion-mettled, proud, and take no care
    Who chafes, who frets, or where conspirers are:
    Macbeth shall never vanquish'd be until Great Birnam wood to high Dunsinane hill
    Shall come against him.
    (IV.i.90-94)

Macbeth interprets this prophecy as a sign of his invincibility, failing to grasp the fact that, on the contrary, it describes the stratagem used to destroy him: Malcolm, leading his troops in the siege of Dunsinane, will give this order:
Let every soldier hew him a bough
And bear't before him: thereby shall we shadow
The numbers of our host, and make discovery
Err in report of us.
(V. iv. 5-8)

Malcolm, after Macbeth's death, is crowned King. Thus, the first apparition refers symbolically to Macbeth himself, the second to Macduff, the third to Malcolm. Macbeth, however, is as incapable of effecting a decoding of the symbolic nature of the figures as of perceiving the ambiguity of their language. This can be seen as an indication that Macbeth's capacity of decoding has been undermined by his desire, since, in his first encounter with the witches, both he and Banquo had realized that several interpretations were possible. "Fair is foul, and foul is fair" (I.i.11), Macbeth already knew.

Banquo, for example, doubts the witches' existence:
"I' the name of truth, are ye fantastical, or that indeed which outwardly ye show?" (I.iii.52-54); and

Were such things here as we do speak about?
Or have we eaten on the insane root
That takes the reason prisoner?
(I.iii.83-85)

Later on, when Macbeth is already Cawdor, Banquo expresses his fear that

That, trusted home,
Might yet enkindle you into the crown,
Besides the Thane of Cawdor. But 'tis strange:
And oftentimes, to win us to our harm,
The instruments of darkness tell us truths,
Win us with honest trifles, to betray's
In deepest consequence.

(I.iii.120-26)

Macbeth here realizes the double possibilities of interpretation, but his choice will be made:

This supernatural soliciting
Cannot be ill, cannot be good; if ill,
Why hath it given me earnest of success,
Commencing in a truth? I am Thane of Cawdor.
If good, why do I yield to that suggestion
Whose horrid image doth unfix my hair
And make my seated heart knock at my ribs,
Against the use of nature? Present fears
Are less than horrible imaginings;
My thought, whose murder yet is but fantastical,
Shakes so my single state of man that function
Is smother'd in surmise, and nothing is
But what is not.

(I.iii.130-42)

The terms "yet" and "surmise" are indicators of the direction to be followed by Macbeth. On the other hand, the opposition and juxtaposition of contraries are emphasized in several ways, such as "nothing is but what is not," in the quotation above, and in the references to Banquo made by the witches:

- Lesser than Macbeth, and greater.
- Not so happy, yet much happier.
- Thou shalt get kings, though thou be none.

(I.iii.65-67)

Again, as in "foul" and "fair," the juxtaposition of contradictions reveals the transitory and ambivalent nature of reality and of the power for which Macbeth strives.

One other device used to reinforce ambiguity is the strange and mysterious mood in which the conflict unfolds. Time references are always to night, night with thunder and storms, or peopled by witches, in which images of blood and death recur. All the traditional formulas that evoke horror occur: spells, the enchantment of prophetic discourse, sounds associated with death (such as the bell tolling when Duncan is murdered or the women's cries announcing Lady Macbeth's suicide), the knocking at the gate, chimneys blowing down, lamentings and strange screams, the earth shaking, the clamours of birds, storms, a falcon killed by an owl, horses turning wild and eating each other. If all these elements tend to create an atmosphere of strangeness, in a paradoxical way they reduce the mystery. The use of such conventions of horror stories indicates that Macbeth's acts are contrary to the laws of Nature and Society and will have to lead to evil and destruction.

One last aspect to be discussed in terms of ironic construction is the relationship between the protagonist and the characteristic by means of which he ascends to power, and the fulfillment or reversal of the expectations of the community. Macbeth is defined, in his own eyes and in that of others, by his strength and courage: "I dare do all that may become a man; who dares do more is none" (p.85). Since these are the qualities by means of which he establishes his identity, to Macbeth the relation between power and action is a necessary one. The alternatives, for him, are not between loyalty and ambition, but rather between passivity or dynamism. Confronted with the decision of yielding or not to the possibility of immediate ascension to power, Macbeth has indeed no real choice. He is a man of action, he is Power itself in process. He is active and dynamic. To deny the impulse to act to achieve the highest position in Scotland is to give up being Macbeth. His excess in the very quality which distinguishes him and makes him fulfill the expectations of the community is exactly what will lead to a reversal, when he violates the rules of the group and threatens the community. Mme. de Stael has pointed out that we have the defects of our own virtues, and it cannot be denied that here lies the tragedy of men: the same force that elevates a man to his full height may destroy him and undermine his greatness. Macbeth is excessive strength, and thus unable to remain in a position of waiting. Accumulating violence upon violence, he prepares his fall, which will be symbolically accompanied by the loss of the quality that defines him: Macbeth, man of action, characterized by strength, is reduced to passivity, decapitated, by Macduff, agent of his destruction. This, once again, reveals how the same quality can be simultaneously good and bad: "Foul is fair, and fair is foul." Nothing is just one thing, no univocal interpretation can be trusted. Power is transitory, as transitory as life itself. Human experience is ambiguous, an ambiguity carried and expressed by the polysemic nature of our discourse.

As he is informed of his wife's suicide, Macbeth presents, in a perfect synthesis, his perception of that transitoriness:

Tomorrow, and tomorrow, and tomorrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time.
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
the way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle!
Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
And then is heard no more; it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury,
Signifying nothing.

(V.iv.19-28)

Macbeth here asserts the illusory character of human experience and, by means of the theatrical metaphor, expresses the belief that life is a fiction, a meaningless tale. A tale which is told by an idiot, projected in words. And words, "they're all we've got to go on."
